Hart-Montague Trail, Rothbury

The trail is twenty-two miles of the former rail bed of the Pere Marquette Railroad. It was made a state park in 1988. The railroad parallels much of the West Michigan Pike route but is most visible between Whitehall and Shelby.

New Era

New Era was found in 1878 by a group of Dutch that had been living in Montague serving as mill hands. They wanted to return to an agrarian lifestyle and purchased farms and planted peach orchards. In 1947, there were eighty-five Dutch families in New Era.

New Era Canning Company

The New Era Canning Company was established in 1910 by Edward P. Ray, a Norwegian immigrant who purchased a fruit farm in New Era. Ray grew raspberries, a delicate fruit that is difficult to transport in hot weather. Today, the plant is still owned by the Ray family and processes green beans, apples, and asparagus.

Concrete Block Buildings. New Era is characterized by a number of vernacular concrete block buildings. Prior to 1900, concrete was not a common building material for residential or commercial structures. Experimentation, testing and the development of standards for cement and additives in the late 19th century, led to the use of concrete a strong reliable building material after the turn of the century. Concrete was also considered to be fireproof, an important consideration as many communities suffered devastating fires that burned blocks of their wooden buildings in the late nineteenth century. Consumers could purchase concrete block forms that enabled them to mix the concrete and make the blocks on site reducing construction costs. Some of the earliest concrete block forms were rusticated so that the finished product would resemble stone, hence the term “rock face” concrete block.

Barrel Roof Building, New Era

Built in 1951 as the New Era Fire Department Building. Though utilized in Europe, barrel roof construction was not introduced into the United States until the 1930s. German structural engineer Anton Tedesko designed a barrel roof dairy barn exhibit building for the Century of Progress in Chicago in 1933. He also constructed America's first large scale barrel roof building, the Hershey Arena in Hershey, Pennsylvania in 1936. Also called thin shell construction, barrel roofs were utilized by the military during World War II.

Quonset Hut, New Era

The Quonset Hut is a unique architectural resource that is on the verge of extinction though it represents a short but deeply affecting period of our history. The lightweight, portable, metal buildings were designed to meet the shelter needs of the military during World War II. Over 153,000 of the corrugated metal pre-fabricated buildings were produced during the war years. A number of Quonset huts were found along Oceana Drive, this one is adjacent to the Hart-Montague Trail.

Grand Army of the Republic (GAR) Statue, New Era Cemetery

The Grand Army of the Republic (GAR) was established after the Civil War by veteran Benjamin Franklin Stephenson of Springfield, Illinois. By 1890 the organization had four hundred thousand members. The GAR developed its own uniform and held regular meetings at local posts. The organization adopted three goals: fraternity, charity and loyalty. Its objectives under loyalty were to preserve Civil War sites and to ensure that those that died during the war were remembered. To that end it placed memorials, such as canons in courtyard squares and statues in cemeteries and parks, around the country.

Charles Mears Barn

Charles Mears was a Chicago businessman that purchased land in Oceana County and was instrumental in developing the region's economy. Mears started a lumber business, dredged a channel and constructed a pier and had piers that enabled large ships to dock there. He also underwrote a brick factory and one of the largest shingle factories in the state. The Mears barn, reportedly built in 1859, is a salt box bank barn and was built as part of a lumber camp. It later served as the barn for a working fruit farm that Mears operated called River House Farm.

Ludington

Ludington Avenue is a mix of architecturally significant historic homes that have been converted to bed and breakfasts and mom and pop motels built after World War II. The concentration along the long avenue that ends at Lake Michigan gives the city a resort town feel.

Bed and breakfasts became popular in America in the 1970s. After World War II travel in the British Isles and Europe was popular and many American travelers experienced a bed and breakfast for the first time. The establishment of the National Historic Preservation Act of 1966 brought attention to historic buildings in America's communities and the introduction of the federal historic preservation tax credit helped property owners to convert large homes to bed and breakfasts.

The word "motel," a coupling of the words "motor" and "hotel," entered popular American vernacular in the 1940s. Prior to that time, travelers typically stayed in tourist cabins and courts. The motel combined a series of individual rooms into one unit saving heating and cooling and other construction costs. Almost all early motels were local family-owned businesses called "mom and pop" motels. They included an attached office and living space. As post war tourism boomed, two-story motels were constructed to increase capacity. In the 1950s national chains, such as Holiday Inn and Howard Johnson's, quickly dominated the motel industry in part due to the construction of the federal highway system in the late 1950s. Though locally-owned mom and pop motels remained popular throughout the 1960s, by the 1970s they had lost favor as people frequented chain motels and hotels that provided a standardized experience and had the financial ability to advertise nationally. Ludington has a high concentration of "mom and pop" motels still in operation and the majority is located on Ludington Avenue.

August Rasmussen arrived soon after and by 1914 there was a large Danish population in the county near Grant and Trufant. From these settlements the Danish population began to spread west into rural areas of Muskegon and Manistee counties and into the city of Ludington. In 1876 R. Rasmussen came from Denmark and opened a boarding house in Ludington's Fourth Ward called the Lake House. Rasmussen served as president of the Danish Aid Society.
